SUBURB CELEBRITIES

Professor Heinz Wolff has been a Suburb resident for 30 years, leading what he calls an 'unclouded' existence among the best of neighbours and a large circle of friends. Both his children went to Child's Way School, and his wife's involvement in Suburb life includes a great concern for conservation.

Professor Wolff's suitably academic appearance is a familiar feature of BBC2's 'The Great Egg Race' where the complicated technology of modern life is gently introduced to us in our homes with a liberal sprinkling of humour.

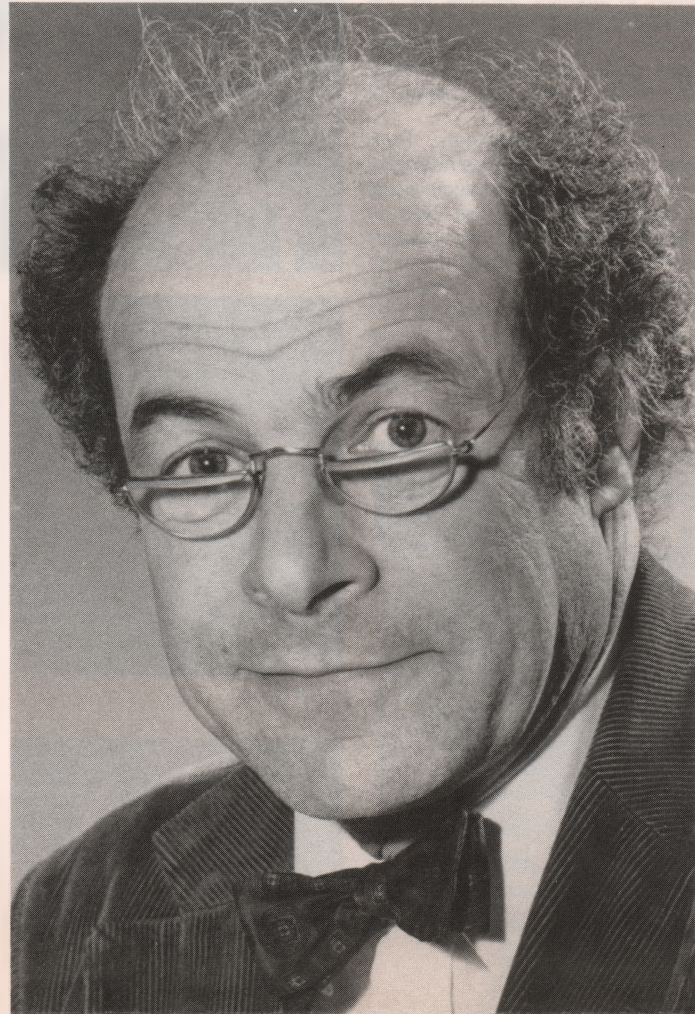

Despite a long career in medical research—at the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, the Medical Research Council, Hampstead, and the Clinical Research Centre, Harrow—Heinz Wolff left medicine behind to develop the long-standing interest in gadgets and technology with which he is popularly associated. He has recently established a new Institute for Bioengineering at Brunel University where his work includes solving problems with technology, and bringing technology further into the sphere of public service and understanding.

He first began broadcasting 20 years ago when he recognised the potential of the media in spreading technological awareness in an entertaining way. In the 1970s he was known for 'The Young Scientist of the Year' Christmas lectures, and six years ago he started his current 'Egg Race'.

Next comes 'Experiments which changed the world' which will discuss fascinating developments such as Marconi's radio and Ehrlich's magic bullet.

Alongside his consuming interest in machinery and gadgets, Professor Wolff retains a love of the unspoiled green areas in and around the Suburb, and he admits he is hard put to think of a nicer place to live. EE
